Early History

In the mid-1950s, Pilsen researchers at Groote, Connecticut, established a new anti-parasitic agent. In order to verify the success of the screen, laboratory mice were inoculated experimentally with Panstrongylus megistus, a well-known blood-sucking parasite that causes the disease Chagas disease. The infected mice were treated orally with samples of flavonoids, which are a class of bioactive compounds that occur naturally in many plants. The flavonoids were effective in reducing the severity of the disease in the infected mice, indicating their potential as anti-chagas agents. The flavonoids were isolated from the leaves of several plant species, and their structures were determined. This led to the discovery of the flavonoid named quercetin, which was found to have significant anti-chagas activity. The flavonoids were also studied for their effects on other parasitic infections, such as malaria and leishmaniasis, and their potential as broad-spectrum antiparasitic agents.
